

By The Glass: Frisky Zebras, A Tetra Pak Wine That Nails It

by Rachel Segal on June 18th, 2008

Tetra Pak wines are tricky business. I love the environmental justification. I hate that it looks cheap. I'm delighted by how much lighter they are to carry. But the one's I've tasted in the past are just so...blah.

But, I'm happy to say that Frisky Zebras does not disappoint. While not as complex and interesting as some of my favorite traditionally bottled varieties, the proper amount of acidity capped off a delicious blend of grapefruit and oranges. Surprisingly refreshing, this South African wine from [United Nations of Wine] confirms for me at least that Tetra Paks are not something to necessarily refuse - even if I will continue to test them out carefully until I encounter a few more out there that are this enjoyable.

<http://www.drinksafterdark.com/by-the-glass-frisky-zebras-a-tetra-pak-wine-that-nails-it/>